Physical and organic hazard factors in an AIDS ward. This study aimed to explore the association between physical and organic hazard factors and elder abuse and maltreatment of hospitalised AIDS patients. Elder abuse and maltreatment of hospitalised AIDS patients have increased in recent years. Elder abuse and maltreatment are associated with poor medical outcomes for elderly patients, including death. Understanding the factors that precipitate these harmful events may assist healthcare professionals in reducing these risks and, ultimately, increase the quality of life of this group of patients. The study used a cross-sectional descriptive design. Data were collected through interviews with the participants and observation of their interactions with the participants. The interviews were transcribed and analysed using a Grounded Theory approach. A total of ten elder abuse and maltreatment cases were identified in the AIDS ward. During observation, medical patients did not show awareness of physical and organic hazard factors, while nursing staff and the family caregivers appeared unaware of their presence. Further research should examine the roles of family caregivers, nurses, and healthcare professionals in the increase of elder abuse and maltreatment among AIDS patients. Future studies could examine the results of a programme to reduce elder abuse and maltreatment of AIDS patients, which may be valuable for the enhancement of quality of care and patient safety.
